For semiconductor fabrication, a semiconductor device is typically fabricated by forming a plurality of layers of material on a semiconductor substrate. For example, devices in a semiconductor device may include a plurality of semiconductor devices such as, for example, a memory device and/or a logic device. In general, a memory device may be classified as a volatile memory device or a non-volatile memory device. Volatile memory devices may include random access memory devices, such as a dynamic random access memory device and/or a static random access memory device. Non-volatile memory devices may include a read-only memory device, a programmable read-only memory device, a magnetoresistive random access memory device, a resistive random access memory device, a magnetic random access memory device, etc. In a non-volatile memory device, data may be written or programmed to the memory cells, and data stored in a memory cell may be read or sensed from the memory cell. However, the non-volatile memory device may not retain the data stored in the memory cell after the supply of power is removed from the memory device. To retain data stored in a memory cell of the non-volatile memory device, an additional circuit, such as, for example, a backup circuit, may be coupled to the memory cell. The backup circuit may provide a signal to a specific input/output (I/O) line based on a data stored in the memory cell. For example, a peripheral circuit may employ a single memory cell to store 1-bit data. In this case, the peripheral circuit may determine whether a data input through the I/O line has a value of one or a value of zero by sensing the data stored in the memory cell. However, if the data stored in the memory cell has a value of one, a current may flow through the I/O line, and a voltage of a specific I/O node may decrease. On the other hand, if the data stored in the memory cell has a value of zero, no current may flow through the I/O line, and a voltage of the specific I/O node may increase.
