— or give up? “A learning end result is the very best way to strengthen their leadership and gain leadership skills.” Professor Dave Christopher When we coach executives, what are the surest sign that we are in a very strong coach-client relationship? The leadership team gives you feedback. They ask, “How did we did? What’s good? What’s great? What can we improve on?” If they don’t do this, that means that they are either not committed to helping you and you (and them) are not in it for the long-haul — or they’re doing you a very small favor, the bare minimum you could expect from them because you are paying them. So one of the swiftest ways of strengthening the bond between a strong coach and a client is by asking the coach — in the midst of those easy but tough questions like, “We’re only managing to do so-and-so by the skin of our teeth” and “I’m frustrated right now” and “I’m just so disappointed about what just happened” — why? M-O-M*as-tician*s-pons*e Coach once explained that for an actor, the best questions he/she can ask an audience are “Who, What, Where and When?” The best interview questions are “Why did you fail?” and “Why did you succeed?” In either case, the point is to see how the client or the audience answers the question. Being thoughtful about what the audience — client, coach, or students — says about the client’s skills or performance is a showstopper to telling the best story possible about the person in the room. “You want to ask the tough questions because you’re not doing your client or your client’s organization any favors by telling them what they think about who they are, what they’re doing, and the results they’re delivering. You want to help them get to know themselves better and understand what they can do better — and that this journey of discovery is going to pay off in the future.” When asking hard questions, you’re starting with what I call an M-O-M-as-tician-s-
