For more information, visit: www.destructoid.com Twitter: @thesmashgames Facebook: www.facebook.com/TheSmashGames -Mai Vaughn This invention relates to a process for the preparation of a polyester amide copolymer. Amorphous polyester amide copolymers are conventionally prepared by (1) reacting an acid chloride and a diamine or an acid anhydride, or (2) reacting a dicarboxylic acid chloride and a diamine and then reacting the resulting product with an amine. The first mentioned process involves the use of phosgene which is extremely toxic and highly corrosive. In addition, the resulting product contains a chlorine-free hydroxy group. Thus, the product can not be used as a hardening agent for a metal-containing resin, such as a metal-containing resin for bonding of a metal or a metal-containing material, or as a resin for the production of a high temperature resistant composite resin. The use of the second mentioned process also involves the use of phosgene which is extremely toxic and highly corrosive. In addition, the resulting product contains a chlorine-free hydroxy group. Therefore, the product is not suitable for the above-mentioned uses. In order to eliminate the above described disadvantages of the conventional processes, it is proposed in Japanese Patent Publication No. 15477/1975 to employ a diamine having an active hydrogen atom, to react a dihalogeno compound with the amine in a solvent at a low temperature, and then to react the product obtained with an acid chloride. However, the resulting product contains at least one of tertiary amine and quaternary ammonium salt in an amount of from about 1 to about 5 percent by weight of the total product. Thus, the product cannot be used for the production of a metal-containing resin, or as a resin for the production of a high temperature resistant composite resin. It is also known to add at least one alkali metal or alkaline earth metal hydroxide, such as NaOH, KOH or Ca(OH)₂, to the dihalogeno compound used in the first mentioned process for the preparation of polyester amide. However, the alkali metal or alkaline earth metal hydroxide is difficult to handle. Further, when NaOH or KOH is used, water is produced as
